PROFILE

Doctoral researcher in Agricultural Economics with research interests at the intersection of migration and mobility, rural development, agricultural labor, social integration, and ASEAN–Korea relations. My research focuses particularly on the experiences of foreign seasonal workers and their interactions with rural communities in the Republic of Korea.

I have experience in field-based and mixed-method research, including survey design, interviews, participant observation, quantitative analysis, and structural equation modeling. Drawing on my academic training in both Korean Studies and Agricultural Economics, as well as my experience working across Vietnamese and Korean contexts, I am interested in developing comparative and locally grounded research on labor mobility, rural transformation, and agricultural cooperation in Southeast Asia and Korea.
